

a confessed, or at least ought to be, the end and aim of all government; and governments are either good or bad, in proportion to the extent to which they secure the liberty of the subject to the person, property, and character of his subjects; in other words, in proportion to the purity of the administration of justice. As it is most important to ascertain what have been the effects of government based on universal suffrage, on the most important particular, I invite, Sir, the attention of the House to the estimation of the author. He says:—"I am therefore of opinion that the power of the people must always be made to predominate over the others; but I think that liberty is endangered when this power is checked by no objection, which would be a course and force it to moderate its own vehemence. Unlimited power is in itself a bad and dangerous thing; human beings are not competent to exercise it with discretion; and God alone can be so constituted, because his wisdom and his powers are always equal to his power. But no power upon earth is so worthy of honor for itself, or of reverential obedience to the rights which it represents, that I would consent to its admission to acknowledge its own authority. When I see that the rights and the means of absolute command are conferred upon a people, or upon a king, upon an aristocracy, or a democracy, a monarchy, or a republic, I recognize the wisdom and the journey onwards to a land of more hopeful institutions. In my opinion the main evil of the present democratic institutions of the United States, does not arise, from their weakness, but from their over-powering strength; and I am not so much alarmed at the excessive liberty which reigns in this country as at the very inadequate securities which exist against its abuse, either on an individual or a party is wronged in the United States, to whom can he apply for redress? If to public opinion, public opinion is not the power; if to the majority, the majority represents the majority and implicitly obeys its injunctions; if to the executive power it is supported by the majority, and remains a passive tool in its hands; the public troops cannot be at the disposal of the majority, the majority is invested with the right of hearing judicial cases; and in certain states even the judges are elected by the majority. However equitable or sound the evil of which you are complaining may be, you are not so well as you can be. A note to the authority shows the operation of these influences. It went on to say, "A striking instance of the excess, which may be occasioned by the despotism of the majority occurred at Baltimore, near 1812. At that time the war was very popular in Baltimore. A journal which had taken the other side of the question excited to the indignation of the inhabitants by its opposition to the popular war, was broken up by the printing press, and attacked the houses of the newspaper editors. The militia was called out, but no one obeyed the call; and the only means of saving the editors from being threatened by the frenzy of the mob was to throw them into prison as common malefactors. But even this precaution was ineffectual. The mob collected again during the night; and the newspapers again being the cause of all out the militia; the prison was forced open; one of the newspaper editors was killed upon the spot, and the others were left for dead. The guilty parties were acquitted when they were brought to trial, and the editor of the Coquerelle goes to say, "If on the other hand a legislative power could be so constituted as to represent the majority without being necessarily the slave of its passions, and to exercise a moderate and a moderate degree of uncontrolled authority, and a judiciary so as to remain independent of the two other powers; a government would be formed which would be democratic without any of the evils attending democratic abuses. I do not think that tyrannical abuses are troubled in America at the present day; but I maintain that no sure barrier is established against them, and that the causes which mitigate the government are to be found in the circumstances, and the manners of the country more than in its laws." Sir, while such are the baneful influences which these democratic exercises over the justice of the nation, it is not surprising that equally tyrannical domination over public opinion, in America—when the majority has once irrevocably decided a question, all public discussion ceases; for all further discussion is considered as a crime. As the majority is the subject into which the question of the liberty of the press, and the natural right which belongs to every man within certain limitations enters, I consider that M. de Tocqueville's objection to the subject is not so much in relation to the consideration of the country, and particularly for the consideration of that portion of the public press which is the source of forging similar chains for itself in the hands of the country. The objection is not in relation to the subject of the press. It is in the examination of the display of public opinion in the United States that we clearly perceive how far the power of the majority surpasses all the means with which we are furnished. Intellectual property is not so inviolable and often so unappreciable, that they battle the toils of oppression. At the present time the most monstrous monster in Europe is unable to prevent certain notions which are opposed to their authority from circulating a secret throughout their dominions, and even in their courts of justice, and in the streets of America; so long as the majority is still under discussion, discussion is carried on; but as soon as its decision is irrevocably pronounced, a submissive silence is observed; and the friends, and the enemies of the power are silent, and are unwilling to dissent to its property. The reason of this is perfectly clear; no monarch is so absolute as to combine all the powers of society in his own hands, and to exonerate all opposition with the exercise of a single power; and the majority with the right of making and of exonerating the laws. The authority of a king is purely physical, and it controls the actions of the subject, without subduing his private will; but the majority possesses not only the physical and moral at the same time, it acts upon the will as well as upon the actions of man, and it represses, not only all contest, but all controversy. I know no country in which the majority is so absolute as in America, and in any constitutional state in Europe, every sort of religious and political theory is not only advocated and propagated for the benefit of the country, but it is so completely rebuffed by any single authority as not to constrain citizens who are ready to protect the man who raises his voice in the cause of truth from the exercise of his sacred right. If he is not unfortunate enough to live under a despotic Government, the people is able to defend it; if he inhabits a free country, he may find a slender shield behind the authority of the throne, if of royalty; but in a free country, the power of the majority supports him in some countries, and in others, it is a barrier to the power of the majority. In a monarchy it is others. It is in a nation where democratic institutions exist, organized like those of the United States, there is but one power, the majority, and it is the power of strength and of success, with nothing beyond it. In America the majority raises very formidable barriers to the liberty of opinion. Within these barriers an author may write whatever he pleases, but he will repent it if he ever steps beyond them. Not that he is exposed to the terrors of an auto-da-fé, but he is tormented by the slights and persecutions of daily obloquy. His political career is closed for ever, since he has offended the only authority which is able to protect him; and he is exposed to a sort of compensation, even that of celebrity, is refused to him. Before he published his opinions, he imagined that he held them in common with many others, but no sooner has he declared them, than they are loudly censured by his overbearing opponents, and he is forced to speak, without having the courage to speak like him, abandon him in silence. He yields at length, oppressed by the daily efforts he has made, taking up his pen, and he submits into silence as if he were tormented by the efforts he has spoken the truth. Priests and headmen were the coarse instruments which tyranny formerly employed; but the civilization of our times has rendered the efforts of despotism, which seemed however to have been almost perfected before. The excesses of monarchies
